Dogliani (Dojan in Piedmonts dialect) has pre-Roman origins: as we can see both from the both toponymy and from recent archaeological finds.

There is in fact evidence of a settlement of populations of Ligurian and Celtic origins. Between the 1st and 2nd centuries, Dogliani was a Roman village. There are many finds of this historical age especially in the area of San Quirico, and the finding of an ancient necropolis. During the low roman empire, the centre of town moved to the Pieve.

The present structure of Dogliani is the result of the Middle Ages: the castle dominates the hills and the village, at the lower part of the village is surrounded by fortifications. The medieval core is still well recognizable today, delimited by the two ancient gateway to the village: Porta Soprana and Porta Sottana. In the early Middle Ages Dogliani was part of the Count of Alba, then passed to the Aleramici of Vasto and then to the Marquis of Busca. In the 12th century, Dogliani obtained with some treaties its first municipal government autonomy

In the sixteenth century Dogliani was occupied first by the French and then by the Spanish due to the war between Francis I of France and Charles V of Spain for the domination in Europe. With the Treaty of Lyon in 1601 Dogliani, and other towns, passed to the Savoy family, which gave it as feud to the families Solaro of Moretta and the Solaro of Borgo. Napoleon, that was called first French "liberators", replaced the previous mindful with the fires that burned Marsaglia, Castellino and Belvedere Langhe.

Dogliani has pre-Roman origins and it is divided into two urban areas: the village, on the valley floor by the Rea River, a right tributary of the Tanaro River, and the Castle. The village has two well-preserved historic centres: one lively and more commercial and the other one, on the above hill that still preserves, almost intact, its appearance of a medieval fortified village with narrow streets, meandering alleys and the ancient walls.
